"Every tree bears fruit.
and the fruit of the heart is a child."
Father's word

Abstract: The article examines the role of parents in raising a child.

Keywords: Family, parents, child, upbringing, education, history, love, loyalty, skill, work, respect, will.

Introduction: For us, raising a child is a family's responsibility to the Motherland and the people, and at the same time, it is its most honorable duty. Accordingly, the book interprets the social activities and family duties of each person in close connection with each other.

The ability to create a harmonious family community is one of the most important factors in raising a child. Each family member must correctly understand their duty and fulfill it wholeheartedly. The book also emphasizes that parents should be kind and respectful to each other for the formation of human qualities in a child. When parents disrespect and hurt each other, they have torn away the faith that was just beginning to sprout in a tender heart with their own hands.

As our ancestors emphasized, if you want to be happy, embody the following virtues: first of all, fulfill your duty to parents, for parental happiness is a great wealth for a person.

In the books "Ahyo" and "Kimyo," the following words are written about children: "A child is a trust in the hands of parents, and their heart is like a delicate gem. Just as various patterns can be engraved on gems, so too can various thoughts be imprinted on a child's heart. A child is like fertile soil; whatever seed you sow in it will grow. Therefore, parents and teachers should collaborate in this endeavor, sowing only the seeds of goodness in their hearts."

Guide the child from the darkness of anger towards the light of knowledge, for knowledge is human pride, while ignorance is negligence.

One of the foundations of fathers' love for their children is to devote all their strength and energy to adorning their children with intelligence and perfection, clothing their being with the garment of skills and professions.

History shows that our fathers are constantly striving to bring the distant members of the family closer and to provide for those in need. They prepare housing for us to live in. They find clothes for us to wear. They endeavor to find food for us to eat and work. Indeed, it is the father who is primarily responsible for the prosperity of every family.

We must recognize that our forefathers worked tirelessly for us, striving with all their might to provide us with all the good things within their power. In gratitude, we should obey them, follow their instructions without question, rush to help when our father is tired or in need of assistance, and always be ready to fulfill our filial duty.

One of the important duties of every child is to show respect and reverence to their parents and to treat them with compassion and mercy. A child who does not please their parents and offends them will never prosper and will not have respect in the eyes of the people!

Our mothers spared no love and affection in raising us, sacrificing their peace, staying awake at night, and dedicating themselves to our upbringing. When we get upset or feel slightly hurt, it's the mother who fusses around us, and when we fall ill, she loses her peace and tranquility. Without a gardener, the fruit of any tree will not be good. A mother is a gardener for us. She is always eager to take care of us. Any child who understands this places their mother above everything else and always respects her.

A wise child never forgets their mother's love, even for a moment. Even when undertaking small tasks, they inform their mother, seek her consent, listen to her words, follow her advice, and always strive to express gratitude to her.

When grown children, having received a good upbringing and mastered a profession, visit their mothers, they never speak harshly to them. Instead, they comfort them with gentle words, remembering that they were once nourished by their mother's milk and cared for in her embrace. They bring to mind the hardships their mother once endured for them, attempting to make her forget these sufferings and toils. They seek to win their mother's heartfelt approval and make her happy for a lifetime.

Therefore, it is the duty of every child to serve their parents. However, this duty is fulfilled when parents need their child's services.

A child's manners towards their parents are such that they listen attentively to everything their parents say. He doesn't come down to them. Whatever they command and what they command, if there is no betrayal or sin, they perform with all their heart and soul. When they get up from their seats, he also jumps up. When called, he answers "yes." He always longs to make them happy. He stands before them with a bow. He doesn't complain about his actions. He doesn't look at his parents with anger or frowning over their occasional actions. He doesn't travel without permission.

Some of his other rights are that he maintains proper etiquette in their presence. He doesn't undress. If something hurts, she tries to hide it as much as possible so as not to worry her parents. He establishes proper etiquette rules in everything similar to it.

According to books, parents have eighty rights over their children. Forty of them are carried out during life, and the remaining forty are carried out after death. Of the forty rights during his lifetime, ten belong to coins, ten to the tongue, ten to the heart, and ten to wealth.

A person always sets certain goals and aspirations, and to achieve them, they constantly work with enthusiasm and perseverance. Some set great goals for themselves and fight fiercely to achieve them, while others limit themselves to dreaming and fantasizing.

Parents can be considered one of the happiest spiritual wealthy people. Because they raise a human child who is more precious than any jewel in the world and leave them as heirs to great deeds.

If parents work tirelessly for years to educate and raise their children to become true human beings, but once do something inappropriate, they greatly damage the respect

History shows that school is the garden of youth, and children are its priceless saplings, and teachers are the wise, diligent, and caring gardeners of this garden.

A wise and intelligent person, even reaching the heights of any science and a high position, never forgets his parents and teachers, because in all his achievements lies their intellect, wisdom, labor, and, moreover, their precious life.

Just as sunlight, water, and air are essential for a plant to grow well, the joint care of parents, teachers, and the community is equally essential for a child's growth.

Every parent sees their child as the most beautiful and precious of all. This is characteristic of parents. Our wise people say: "Typraticum - my soft one, beetle - my white one." However, excessive parental affection and inappropriate pampering can lead to unpleasant consequences.

The child is born in debt to the mother, the mother embraces him warmly, gives him milk, cares for him for years, raises him, and thanks to the mother's hardships, the child's debt grows. Only a person deprived of feelings of heart and conscience can hurt the mother of the world and turn a blind eye to her sufferings.

If a person hopes to dig a well but doesn't get water, it's very bad, if they raise children all their life but don't enjoy it, it's even worse.

Days, months, and years add to a child's life, life, work, and knowledge add to his intellect and perception.

If there is no harmony, love, and loyalty between father and mother, the suffering of this will be severe not only for them but also for their children.

A child is proud of their self-confidence and is especially pleased to have earned the trust of parents and teachers; therefore, the educator's (parents') ability to rationally combine demanding and trusting behavior positively influences the child's up

As is known, the taste of food is known not by the spoon, but by the tongue. The pleasure of life is known not by the lazybones lying in the shade, but by those who built it with their own labor. If a father and mother raise their children in the spirit of diligence and pass on to them the best human qualities, they will make their children happy for life. Some parents "gift" their children pampering and make them unhappy forever.

A child should be raised to speak the truth, to be brave, not afraid of death, to be ashamed of being disgraced before the people, and to be modest. We know that sculpture is made by skilled hands. It represents a beautiful image that amazes one'

It is necessary to raise a child with a strong will, because all the movements of a person without willpower are like the movements of a kite. A weak-willed person sways like branches in the direction of the wind.

Just as a bad wound leaves an ugly mark on a child's face in infancy, the bad habits learned in childhood remain the same after growing up.

It is better for parents to pass on their good services to the people and homeland as inheritance rather than accumulating property and leaving it as inheritance to their children, because this inheritance remains an invaluable, eternal gift for future generations.

It's good when parents give useful advice to a child, but even better when they show examples from their own life experiences.

A child is like a bird whose one wing is its parents, and the other is its teacher and community. These wings, with their coordinated movements, guide the child into life. If the child's wings move in opposite directions, the child cannot rise.

The upbringing of the eldest child in the family is of particular importance, as the younger ones follow him. Our people say that where the big cart goes, the small cart follows it.

Discord in the family is a poisonous bullet into a child's nerves and health. The family is like a boat sailing on the sea. If the head of the family is a wise, strong-willed person, and if family members are united with each other, they will withstand any waves and reach their intended destination. A child's heart is like an unopened enigma, and finding the key that opens it depends on the teacher's skill.

There are both heartless women who give birth to a child and abandon them, and compassionate women who embrace and raise abandoned infants. The MOTHER didn't give birth to the child, but raised and nurtured them.

My student, do not try to teach your students without a deep understanding of the laws of the development of nature and society, as well as human thought. Because it cannot be explained without understanding.

My student, take a look at the bird, it will press the egg to its warm embrace and give it life. You too were a piece of flesh, nourished by a mother's warm affection, pure and pure milk, and found your tongue and heart. Dear mother, don't forget!

Parents must have in their hearts the heart of a legendary giant, in their hearts the scorching heat of the sun, in their will the endurance of steel, the sharp eyes of a far-sighted eagle, the lamp of wisdom like the transparent light of a mirror, and an inexhaustible spring of love and knowledge like a clear spring.

The value of fruit is known to those who plant and grow it, and the value of a child is known to those who raise and nurture it.

It is necessary to educate the child, raise him to be capable of life, energetic, and sociable. Raising a child capable of life is the sacred duty of parents.

It should be understood that morality and manners are twins born from labor.

Life experience shows that life has its bitter and sweet sides, and only a person who has tasted both can feel the value of life and people more deeply. Because human experience shows that rain is grass, and honest work makes a person's face beautiful.

Our people didn't say in vain that wealth that comes without labor is a vice, and what comes with sweat from the forehead is pleasure.

In life, it's good to save three things: save time - it won't return; save your words - you won't lose your worth; restrain your desires - your dignity won't be damaged.

Of course, to be a worthy parent, a body needs health, and a head needs intelligence.

If your child is talkative from childhood and does little, they will still love talking more than working when they grow up.

In raising a child, parents should pay great attention to their acquisition of knowledge and skills. Knowledge and skills are such selfless possessions that they never burden a person, but rather make your burden lighter and your difficulties easier.

Knowledge is beautiful with work, desire with zeal.

My beloved student, always be a slave to your mind and conscience, but be master of your tongue and will!

Our wise people say: "It is better to ride a camel and look far ahead." To strive for it wisely with foresight is the work of the wise.

If a person's intellect and perception do not grow with age, they will be deprived of the lessons of the great school of life.

There should be a balance between the child's age and their behavior, otherwise they might become a laughingstock to others with their childish behavior.

Just as the strength and power of rivers are measured by the number and strength of tributaries flowing into them, the greatness of good people is measured by the number and quality of people who emulate them.

Of course, Parents need to know who their child is friends with, because a person is judged by their friends.

It's no secret that life never develops smoothly. We cannot deny the existence of inequalities in raising children. The number of negative consequences encountered in our lives may have increased, but hasn't decreased.

There are also some brides and grooms who love their honey, chase their bees, love their children, and push their mothers, but their marriage is fragile.

My student, your criterion in love should be classical aspirations based on noble morality and refinement, and its rational striving. Because you are a precious child of the great ones.

It is known that a person who is not loyal to their spouse and does not fulfill their parental duty in the family is not worthy of people's attention and respect.

A person should have status in their own home. Someone who isn't needed by their own household isn't needed by others either.

No matter how much you place a stone next to gold, the stone's value won't increase, and gold won't become worthless. Likewise, no matter how much the slanderer throws stones of blame at a true person, in the eyes of the people, the slanderer is respected, and the pure person is not disgraced.

My student, no matter what career you occupy, remember that the oceans need small tributaries.

To say that I have been educated and have no need to be educated is itself a sign of ill-manneredness. Because life is in constant development. Therefore, a person is constantly being educated.

Humility and arrogance are two opposing paths: one of these paths brings you closer to people, and the other distances you from people.

There are ambitious people who don't respect their parents even during their lifetime and don't even visit them with a single piece of bread. However, after their death, they hold handkerchiefs in their hands for the master to see and weep while reciting prayers.

A boastful person is like a chatterbox chirping, saying "my feet hold the world up."

Experience shows that mighty and deep rivers flow silently, shallow streams are noisy, and wise and energetic people speak little and do much.

A child who does not value their parents loses their sense of conscience and honor. Along with giving the child freedom to play their favorite, good games and rest, it is necessary to teach them to appreciate the value of a golden life.

A child's heart is as pure as an unopened bud, and the preservation of its purity is in the hands of us, parents and educators.

Just as it is happiness for every parent to be proud of their good children, it is even greater and more honorable for children to speak their names with respect, calling them "my father, my mother."

Parents are the child's two most loving pillars. Therefore, it is the human duty of every son and daughter to honor and respect them during their lifetime.

My student, learn from the invaluable riches created by workers, and most importantly, make it a habit to contribute as much as you can to increase these riches!

It is very important to raise a child to be interested in natural and social phenomena, to be observant, since this is how scientific research skills begin in a person.

The spinning wheel, sharpening a child's mind like a diamond, is a regular life exercise.

The frequent meetings of children with progressive and respected people both at home and at school positively influence the formation of their worldview. It is known that a child's psyche is prone to imitating adults.

Raising a child in the spirit of brotherhood and friendship with all working people of the world is an integral part of the educational work in Muslim families. Therefore, our children will grow up to be true internationalists.

The most correct form of educating a child is to politely make them acknowledge the harmfulness of their mistakes and inappropriate actions, guiding them to the right path.

A child's passion for science is itself beauty; if it is adorned with the garment of aspiration, beauty is added to beauty.

A child's talent expects fire from us, the educators. If we can ignite it, it will shine like light.

Just as a plant doesn't grow without soil, a child doesn't develop wrong behavior without reason.

If you want your children to be pure in life, don't cast impure glances at others' children.

It is necessary to raise a child so that they are not satiated with pleasure, but with knowledge and enlightenment.

Shouting and quarrelsomeness are also diseases, these diseases are often transmitted to children from parents and adults.

Some people, staring into your eyes, fabricate lies, and are not even ashamed to say that they saw something that didn't exist. The companionship of this vice is also added to his core in childhood.

If we can give a child a wonderful upbringing, it will add to your life, otherwise it will cut your life.

For a child to have high aesthetics, first of all, the surrounding environment must be beautiful, and the child must be not just a spectator of ready-made beauty, but a creator of beauty.

Teaching a child patience and endurance has its place, time, and measure. It is known that blind tolerance of some people's inappropriate and harmful behaviors is a sign of weakness.

In some families, one child is constantly palpated, and the other is nudged. As a result, one of them develops feelings of hatred towards their parents, while the other develops spoiled moods.

We, as educators and parents, share, to a certain extent, in the good and honorable deeds of our children, as well as in their unworthy actions.

Since you raised your child thinking "let me wear it or not eat it, let everything be yours" and thinking only about their own interests, don't be surprised if they don't appreciate you.

When educating young people, we must consider the difference between the environment in which we lived and grew up and the current conditions. Because the messages that influence their development are incomparably numerous and multifaceted.

An excessive, affectionate response to children is often heartless.

For parents, the best gift from a child is the good and honorable work done on their own initiative.

It is incorrect to recognize a child's shortcoming and turn away from it, because every child with a defect has at least one positive quality. This quality should be the foundation of upbringing.

If your child hasn't found their place in life, it's a sign of your indifference to preparing them for life and their future.

A child who observes life asks many questions. A wise answer perfects his mind.

If a child lacks observation of life and existence, they become dull and foolish. Therefore, it is necessary to develop their observation skills.

Life has complex, knotty problems. To be able to find and solve them with wisdom and insight, a person needs to acquire knowledge and skills from childhood.

My student, know that your being belongs to the earth, and your past belongs to the people.

Nature is also a kind of educator. It sometimes accustoms its seedlings to cold storms and scorching heat. From time to time, she gently washes her with crystal drops, caressing her face with the gentle breeze.

A child's initiative is like a seed scattered on the ground; if cared for in time, it grows and spreads wings.

The cleanliness and orderliness of the child's environment, school, and family play an important role in raising them to be clean-natured.

As the President of our country noted: "School is not only a place of education, but also a cradle of high spirituality for all of us, an institution that teaches our children professions from childhood".
